This course is intended to introduce you to a global way of thinking about World War II. The topics that you usually think of regarding World War II will be covered – the war in Europe and the Pacific Theater, the Holocaust, the atomic bomb, and so on – but you will also engage in serious study of parts of the war that you may know little or nothing about, most especially the war as it affected South Asia and East Asia (especially China). Students will thus be challenged to put a “familiar” event into unfamiliar contexts. Throughout, we will ask you to make global connections, and think both thematically and globally on issues such as colonialism (and postcolonialism), modernity, gender roles, politics, espionage, and the coming of the Cold War.

Note: this course carries a substantial reading load. If you don’t like to read sizable works of history, drop the course. Please note that a fair amount of our course material – dealing as it does with war, death, genocide, racism, and the like -- may be deeply disturbing.

TA for Course: Madelyn Hulsted, COLU 2038.
